

2026 AI Construction Trends: 25+ Experts Share Insights

[Article originally appeared in Autodesk Construction Cloud Blog. <https://construction.autodesk.com>]

By Jenny Ragan

AI has officially moved past the hype phase in construction, and the reality is a bit more nuanced than the headlines suggest.

As we've found in Autodesk's State of Design & Make: Construction Spotlight report, AI continues to be top of mind for construction leaders. Early adopters are using AI to help them analyze more variables, move faster during design and planning, and reduce manual work.

That said, folks aren't as enthusiastic about AI as they were a year ago, and we found that just 32% of construction leaders say they've met or are close to meeting their AI goals.

Regardless of how you feel about AI, it's definitely here to stay. Firms that have a solid grasp of where the technology is heading will be better equipped to harness AI effectively in 2026 and beyond.

With that in mind, we reached out to 25+ construction experts to get their take on the AI construction trends that will shape 2026.

Democratizing AI in Design

Kassem Ben Abid, BESIX

AI is becoming indispensable in our industry, although it is still not fully structured. By 2026, AI agents will be more common and widely democratized. I expect AI usage to become more standardized, supported by structured libraries. AI will also enable stakeholders to take advantage of multiple options during the design stage. The client, the architect and the contractor will be able to generate and simulate several design alternatives with a single click and select their preferred option based on specific criteria.

The growing reliance on cloud services might quickly lead to saturation, creating challenges with connectivity and data security. This will push companies and authorities to work on-premises and continue building data centers to maintain data sovereignty. When the cloud keeps growing, we shouldn't be surprised by the rain. We just need to be prepared for it. AI remains highly energy-intensive and will need to be used wisely."

More Time Making Decisions, Less Time Processing Information Ron Arana

Ron Arana, Arana Group

"In 2026, AI will make the biggest impact in everyday project management and field operations. Instead of feeling like a separate tool, AI will become a built-in assistant that quietly supports teams by summarizing RFIs, drafting meeting recaps, organizing punch lists, and identifying schedule or cost risks earlier than before. This will help project managers and superintendents spend more time making decisions and less time processing information.

AI will also improve accuracy and visibility on the jobsite. Tools that combine AI with reality capture and model-based workflows will help teams understand what has been installed, what is missing, and where potential issues may be forming. This will reduce rework, improve quality, and support more reliable progress tracking.

Another major shift will be the accessibility of AI for smaller firms. As AI becomes easier to use and more integrated into existing platforms, companies of all sizes will be able to improve coordination, documentation, and risk management without adding more administrative burden."

Steven Bloomer

"In 2026, I expect AI to be far more embedded in day-to-day project delivery, not as a standalone feature, but as a practical layer that supports

How Diverse Is the Construction Workforce?

[Article originally appeared in www.nahb.org]

Diversifying the construction labor force remains a key priority amid persistent skilled labor shortages.

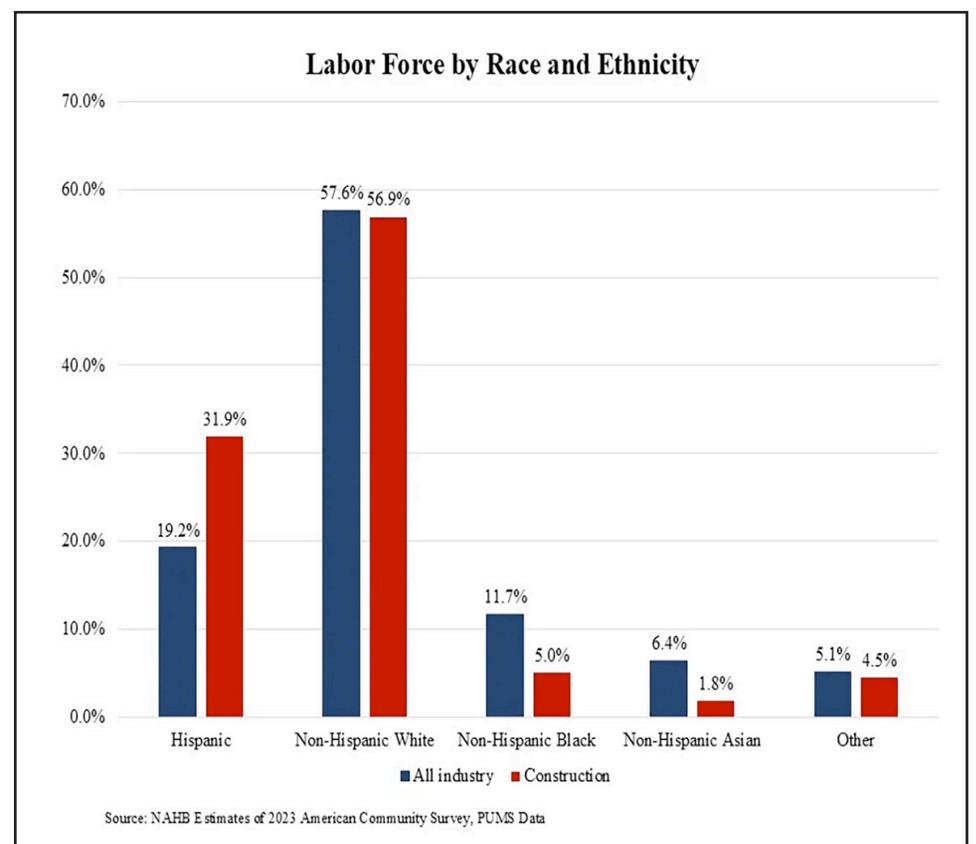

According to the 2023 American Community Survey, non-Hispanic White workers still account for the majority of the construction industry at 57%. Hispanic workers now represent nearly one-third of the labor force at 32%, followed by non-Hispanic Black workers at 5% and non-Hispanic Asian workers at 1.8%.

The most notable trend in construction labor force has been the steady rise of Hispanic participation. Between 2010 and 2023, the number of Hispanic workers in construction increased from 2.5 million to almost 3.8 million. Over the same period, their share of the labor force climbed from 23.6% to 32%, meaning that nearly one in three construction workers today is Hispanic.

Hispanic workers comprise a larger share in the construction than the broader economy, making up 31.9% of the construction labor force compared with 19.2% across all industries. Non-Hispanic White workers account for 57.5% of the construction labor force, about the same as their share across all industries at 58.3%. Black and Asian workers, by contrast, remain underrepresented in construction.

2026 AI Construction Trends: 25+ Experts Share Insights

faster decisions, cleaner data, and smoother coordination across teams.

One of the biggest changes I see coming is how people interact with project information. Instead of switching between platforms or digging through documents, AI will make it possible to simply ask for what you need and receive it instantly, drawings, specifications, past decisions, or model updates. This shift will cut out a lot of unnecessary searching and reduce delays.

I also believe AI will play a larger role in keeping data consistent and complete. It will quietly handle routine checks, highlight gaps, and keep information aligned across disciplines. Designers, engineers and construction teams will spend more time focusing on what matters, problem-solving, while AI manages the background housekeeping.”

From Embedded to Essential

Alireza Borhani, Massport

“AI is already embedded in construction workflows today, and its role will continue to expand in 2026. AI chatbots will remain a powerful tool for everyday tasks such as summarizing documents and assisting with communications—making routine work faster and more efficient. At the same time, I expect to see progress in domain-specific applications. Generative AI will continue to be leveraged for automated creation of parametric design alternatives.

As organizations invest in enterprise AI adoption, priorities will shift toward transparency, governance, and adaptability. There will be growing demand for clear AI performance evaluation workflows, robust support for training and customization to meet organization-specific needs, and strong measures for cybersecurity and data privacy. Despite these advancements, the human element will remain indispensable, and human oversight will continue to play a critical role.”

Making AI More Spatially Intelligent

Hammad Chaudhry, Cupix

“In 2026, AI systems for construction are going to start to draw more on spatial context—in other words, accurate captures of the world around us. Most AI systems today have been trained on textual data (documents, schedules, structured records), but not visual data. They can optimize a plan, but can’t detect if the plan is executable or not based on site conditions. The result is often insight that looks correct on paper but fails in the field.

This is where spatial grounding starts to matter. When AI systems are connected to visual and spatial data from the job site, they gain a form of situational awareness. They can begin to reconcile what the schedule says with what the site shows. That does not magically solve execution, but it closes a critical gap between digital intent and physical reality.

This feels like the missing link in many AI stacks today. Not more intelligence in isolation, but intelligence grounded in what is actually happening. In that sense, spatial AI is less about prediction and more about verification. Less about replacing judgement and more about scaling it.”

Predicting Problems Before They Appear

Elliot Christiansen, Cleveland Construction, Inc.

“In 2026, AI will transition from experimental to essential becoming a foundational layer of modern construction operations. Project teams will increasingly rely on AI to read drawings, analyze field data, monitor inspections, summarize reports, and surface early indicators of risk. This shift will allow teams to spend less time compiling information and more time making informed decisions.

Predictive capabilities will accelerate. AI will help identify schedule impacts, procurement risks, and coordination challenges before they materialize, improving planning accuracy and strengthening project outcomes. The value will not be automation alone; it will be the ability to anticipate issues early enough to act. Ultimately, AI will enhance, not replace, the construction workforce by accelerating decision-making and capturing the expertise that sustains successful projects.”

From Future Trend to Industry Baseline

Ben Cochran, Autodesk

“The use of AI tools will create a significant bifurcation—companies that adapt will see better returns in 2026, with that advantage compounding through 2027 and beyond. 2026 marks the shift from AI as a ‘future trend’ to ‘industry baseline.’ Firms that fail to adopt risk losing contracts to competitors who deliver faster, safer, and more sustainably. Early adopters will capture a disproportionate value as AI scales from pilots to production deployment, establishing competitive moats that will be difficult to overcome.”

Managing Expectations in 2026

Judd Fuoto, Southland Industries

“Perhaps I’m too pessimistic, but I don’t believe AI will be terribly transformative in construction in 2026. I regularly tell people that training AI is akin to educating a child – and AI for construction is still, in my opinion, too early in its training fulfill the big promises being made by the tech sector. That said, as AI is more heavily relied upon, I think concerns around legal liability and intellectual property will help the construction industry focus on how to best shape its use of AI technology going forward.”

Understanding Projects Faster

Jeff Gerardi, Autodesk

“I’m predicting a major shift in how we trust, adopt, and ultimately depend on AI in 2026. AI is already helping us analyze data, automate tedious takeoff tasks, and even forecast outcomes. That impact grows exponentially when all project data—from every stage of the construction lifecycle—lives in one connected environment.

This year’s customer conversations have reinforced a key insight: AI’s next frontier isn’t just doing tasks for us but helping teams understand their projects more deeply and far faster than ever before. Traditionally, “learning a project” meant hours of studying drawings, reviewing models (when available), performing takeoffs, hunting down updated costs, and combing through massive spec books.

In 2026, AI will start transforming that process. It will digest these documents, summarize what matters, surface actionable insights, and highlight every scope area that needs to carry a cost. The anxiety of missing something in a bid—the highs, lows, and second guessing—will become a thing of the past.”

Matt Goshon, ArchKey Solutions

“On the AI side, my view is simple, you either get on the bus, or you get left standing at the stop. The last time the industry saw this level of hesitation around new technology was when the internet showed up, and anyone who resisted it found themselves playing catch-up for years. I do not believe AI replaces expertise, but it absolutely accelerates it. I use AI to generate a fast, accurate foundation, then I layer in the human judgment, constructability awareness, and project nuance that only experience provides. The companies that figure out how to blend the speed of AI with the decision-making of real builders will outperform the rest, and they will do it at scale.”

Major Changes Coming to California Private Construction Projects in 2026: What You Need to Know

[Article originally appeared in www.jdsupra.com]

By Jessica A. Robison

California has enacted two significant reforms that will reshape private construction contracts starting January 1, 2026. These changes impact change-order payment procedures and retention limits, creating new compliance obligations for owners, contractors, and subcontractors. Please see below for a breakdown of everything you need to know before SB 440 and SB 61 take effect.

1. SB 440 – Private Works Change Order Fair Payment Act (Civil Code §§ 8850–8851)

For contracts signed on or after January 1, 2026, SB 440 introduces California's first mandatory statewide process for handling change-order and extra-work disputes on private works projects. Key provisions include:

- 30-Day Response Requirement: Owners must respond in writing to contractor claims within 30 days.
- 60-Day Payment Rule: Undisputed amounts must be paid within 60 days or accrue 2% monthly interest.

- Structured Dispute Resolution: Disputed claims require meet-and-confer and mediation before litigation.
- Right to Suspend Work: Contractors may stop work if owners fail to comply with timelines or refuse mediation.
- Subcontractor Protections: Subcontractors can require general contractors to submit claims and approve settlements.
- Waivers Void: Contract provisions waiving these rights are unenforceable.
- Sunset Clause: Law repeals January 1, 2030.

Impact: SB 440 strengthens payment protections for contractors and subcontractors while imposing strict compliance obligations and penalties on owners.

2. SB 61 – Retention Cap on Private Works (Civil Code § 8811)

Also effective January 1, 2026, SB 61 limits retention on most private construction projects to 5% a major shift from the traditional 10%. Key provisions include:

- 5% Maximum Retention: Owners may not withhold more than 5% retention on private works projects.
