

Industry-Academic Partnerships Create New Educational Approach to Fill Construction Worker Gap

[Article originally appeared on
www.constructionexec.com]

By Tobias Newham,

Faced with an increasing shortage of construction jobs, industry-academic partnerships are needed to draw highly skilled workers to close a widening gap in this field.

These partnerships are essential to the construction profession, as they provide new and innovative vocational educational curriculum and facilities designed to expand and improve training for the industry's future workforce.

This collaboration has great potential to reverse the downward trend in construction workers nationwide. According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, unfilled positions in the construction industry are expected to grow to more than 740,000 vacancies by 2026.

This problem is compounded by the graying of the construction business. According to industry statistics, the average age for skilled craft professionals in the United States is 51 years old, and more than 40% of those workers will be retired by 2030.

"We're running out of folks to build what we need," says Rusty Vaughn, fundraising co-chair of the Construction Education Foundation of North Texas, at a presentation last year on educating a new generation of industry leaders.

Voc-Ed Seen as Alternative to Rising Four-Year College Costs

A renewed focus on vocational construction education comes at a critical juncture, as rising costs to attend traditional four-year colleges and universities restrict student access to these institutions. This has led to an increasing number of college-bound students opting for more affordable educational alternatives, such as vocational careers in construction at two-year community colleges.

Pricey college tuition, housing, and other expenses have made a discernible impact on the current generation, Gen Z. Many of those students bypass traditional four-year colleges because of concerns of incurring massive debt that still haunts their predecessors, Millennials.

Gen Zers also tend to approach higher education as a value proposition. They shun fields of study at higher education institutions that aren't a sound return on their investment. In contrast, vocational training teaches specific skills that are in high demand in construction and other industries.

Besides affordability, vocational educational institutions have appreciably improved their image. For the most part, they no longer have to contend with an outdated characterization of being training grounds or "shop" classes for low-paying, blue-collar jobs. Today, these schools are viewed mainly as an opportunity for a rewarding, stable and challenging career without going deep in debt.

In addition, community colleges partnering with the construction industry are developing practical curriculum to ensure what students learn is readily applicable in the field. Those schools also offer the latest construction technology to give students the know-how to be successful in this increasingly technology-driven business.

For this approach to work, it also requires industry collaboration with public school districts to create programs that identify and engage students who may harbor an interest in construction. For instance, middle-school students enrolled in a vocational program can get an industry certificate or an associate's degree by the time they receive their high-school diplomas, giving them a head-start in launching their careers.

It may also help reduce the rate of high school drop-outs, as job opportunities in construction may be the right incentive to keep those students in school.

Vocational education isn't just for those still in high school or recent graduates. It can provide valuable training for construction employees seeking to brush up on their job skills or offer a new career path for laid-off workers and others who endured economic hardships amid the pandemic.

Innovative Building Design Influences Enhanced Learning Environment

But the success of the industry-academic alliances is heavily dependent on the learning environment. Many buildings housing voc-ed programs need to adhere to designs that enable new concepts and skills to be taught in the classroom to enhance the overall learning experience.
